

Telehealth

Telehealth is the practice of using electronic information systems with telecommunications technology to support the long-distance delivery of care. The practice of telehealth gives care providers the ability to diagnose, receive, and transfer appropriate health data, address questions, provide information, and oversee treatments and therapies for patients who are difficult to care for face to face (i.e., location).